Holiday Tips for Seniors and Their Caregivers

Advice From Rothkoff Law Group

While the holiday season is joyous for many people, it can present complications for those who are caregivers of the elderly. Janie De Leon-Male, Director of Care Coordination at Rothkoff Law Group, explains, “People love the holidays but many become overwhelmed when coordinating all of the family get-togethers and dinners. When someone is a caregiver, chances are that person is already stressed and this just adds to every day pressures.”

De Leon-Male offers practical advice that can be helpful to caregivers during the holiday season.

- Scents Bring Back Memories
 - Sharing Responsibilities
 - Enjoy Family Traditions
 - Caregivers Need Respite – a little rejuvenation goes a long way
- If someone is a caregiver to a loved one with some type of cognitive memory impairment, it’s surprising to discover how one reacts to the scents of the holiday season. De Leon-Male recommends bringing these scents to the forefront. “Did your loved one often bake apple or pumpkin pies, cinnamon buns, or gingerbread during the holiday? Or maybe the scents of holly, mistletoe, or pine were a common sign of the holiday season in your home. A caregiver can take advantage of the many candles in festive or seasonal fragrances. Using some of these scents can create a special time of sharing with your loved one.”

- De Leon-Male also recommends giving everyone a job when they're home. Children are home from college, school-age children are home all day on winter break and in-laws or family may be in visiting. "This is a great time for everyone to feel needed and appreciated," she says.
- Passing down recipes and family traditions is wonderful with multi-generational families and makes the oldest memories feel valued. De Leon-Male says, "While you're lucky enough to have a multi-generational household, ask your loved one, if they're able, to teach your kids the family secret recipe. Or if your kids are older and know the recipe already, ask them to cook with your parent. It's a great way to allow your loved one to feel useful again. Experiencing the holidays through a grandchild's eyes could make your loved one feel young again."
- Caregivers need to think of themselves sometime and when visiting relatives are around, that's the perfect time. De Leon-Male says, "Don't be afraid to ask for help from others. Visiting relatives would probably like to be useful and relieving the caregiver by doing every day chores or spending time with a loved one, will mean the caregiver can have a respite time to relax and do something they rarely have time to do. Even for a few hours, this can be rejuvenating and everyone benefits."
